"Martha" rushes to the defense of her oiled sisters, thus: A PLEA FOR THE FALLEN.

BY A LADY.

EDITOR SUNDAY BULLETIN:

DEAR SIR:—Feeling enconraged by your courtesy, I am going to trouble you with another correspondence on the subject of these poor deluded creatures who are running the road to ruin. I perceive, whether owing to the boldness of The BULLETIN or not I cannot say, that the police have actually routed one notorious house of ill-fame and closed it. But I would like the public to be informed whether those fines have yet been paid which were imposed, or whether it is only a make believe. The costs are carefully collected, but are the fines also? Or are these houses a sort of bank upon which to draw, for the benefit of the city officers? The public have a right to know. The treasurer can give the desired information. It is, too, a remarkable fact that whilst every drunken wretch is pounced upon—in some cases more "sinned against than sinning,"—that in no case do we find the more guilty male companion of these girls hauled up for justice. There seems to be a wheel within a wheel. O, shame! I had almost said the tempted are punished, the tempter—the nice young man—society's pet—the curled, scented darling of the city—the floating rough and beguiled sojourner from other localities—by some manipulation goes free.

I do not desire to trespass too much upon your columns, but I must beg leave once more to trouble you with the consideration—a most serious one—what can be done to redeem those of these unfortunates who have not yet become hardened in vicious courses. This is nothing but our duty as christian women. It is my intention to submit a reformatory proposition to the ladies of this city, which I humbly believe may, with the divine blessing, be the means of rescuing some poor soul from perdition.
